

Edward Bly Dalliston

M1/7973 Corporal, 52nd Motorised Transport Company, Army Service Corps

He died at home in London on 1st December 1915, aged 43

Edward is buried at Richmond Cemetery, Surrey.

Dalliston was in the Army Service Corps and described as being part of the Expeditionary Force when he died. Generally speaking, casualties from the Army Service Corps (they were responsible for military logistics, ensuring ammunition and other supplies arrived where and when needed) appear in small isolated groups, or as single casualties. Dalliston appeared in a list described as 'Died' as opposed to 'Killed' or 'Died of Wounds'. He is also, separately, described as dying 'At Home'. This does not necessarily mean he died at his home, merely he died in this country. The most likely scenario is that he died in a Military Hospital in this country and since his record describe him as being based in Aldershot, the Hospital may well have been the famous Cambridge Military Hospital, currently being converted to rather chic apartments!

The following casualties amongst non-commissioned officers and men of the Expeditionary Force, not previously published, are reported under various dates:—

Digging deeper into the records, it transpires that the 52nd Motorised Transport Corps was a Regular Army Home Depot / Discharge Centre in Aldershot. Regular Army it may have been and participation in both the Boer and Somali

Land Wars confirm he had been an enlisted man, but by the outbreak of War Dalliston had left the Army. He was then a married man, raising his children in Hounslow. Working as a Brewer's Drayman, these skills would have ideally suited him for the Battalion he wound up in when he re-enlisted in November 1914.

Aged 43 at the time of his death, it is looking more and more likely that this Old Soldier had died of illness or disease rather than from battle injuries. Checking into the CWGC records and we find that he did indeed die of disease and was buried at the Richmond Cemetery. I suspect his family had been hugely relieved that he was in a 'cushy' job, only to experience heartbreak in early 1916. I can't imagine he was an exceptional soldier, the highest rank he achieved was Acting

Corporal, a promotion that was not made permanent, he was back to being a Lance Corporal at the time of his death. However, he had previously risked his life for his Queen, King and Empire and was ready to do the same again.

Edward Bly Dalliston's family did their best to ensure he would not be forgotten; his memorial in the Richmond Cemetery is not a standard Military one, instead his final resting place has been marked by a memorial erected by his family. He also appears on a memorial board at St Anne's Church Kew as well as the Harleston one.

Designed by Messrs Goodale & C^o of Richmond, the Richmond memorial was unveiled by Field Marshal Sir William Robertson on 23 November 1921 at a ceremony attended by the Mayor and Corporation.

The upperpart carries Richmond Borough's coat of arms to the north-east and south-west, the figure of a sailor to the north-west and a soldier to the south-east. Below the Borough arms is inscribed PRO PATRIA/ 1914 – 1918. The walls of names were added to the memorial after a newspaper campaign in 1989. The head of the sailor, cut off by vandals in 2003, has since been restored.

So, we know that Dalliston and his Cambridge born wife had settled down in South London hence the Richmond and Kew monuments, what was the Harleston link?

Edward appeared living with his parents in Denton in 1881 with a pair of older, twin brothers and three younger siblings; his father, Henry, was a builder and the family had moved up from Suffolk sometime between the birth of the 10 year old twins and 7 years old Edward. Henry Dalliston appears to have speedily embedded himself in the community and became the Parish Constable, with a reasonably light touch as the following snippet indicates.

John Andrews, of Topcroft, shoemaker, was charged by Henry Dalliston, of Denton, carpenter, with an assault on June 11th. Complainant, who is parish constable of Denton, was sent for to the Watch House Inn to clear the place of some parties who were fighting. While engaged in doing this he was struck by defendant. It did not appear that the assault was a severe one, and an application was made that the case might be settled out of Court, as the complainant was unwilling to push matters further. This was done on defendant paying the costs.

They were not in Denton for much longer as when the father Henry, died on the 24th of October 1885, at the early age of 42, they were already living in Wortwell, the home village given for the family in subsequent records.

Perhaps the death of his father precipitated Dalliston's enlisting and, much as we supposed from the evidence above, in 1891 Edward was in the Army, a cavalry regiment in fact, the 8th Hussars.

At the time the regiment was based up at the Norwich Cavalry Barracks. We are lucky enough to have his original attestation documents which reveal he was almost 18, lived in Wortwell and enlisted in Harleston in 1890, where he was working as a blacksmith. Some six weeks after he had enlisted in the Norfolk Artillery, he was transferred to the 8th Hussars.

He was not the only member of the family to follow this route out of rural Norfolk, in 1904, William Dalliston, aged 20 and also of Wortwell who was working as a bricklayer for a Mr Hipperson in Harleston also joined up. This turned out to be our Edward's younger brother, his junior by 13 years. I think the family must have been fairly close knit as in 1901, Willie (as he was known) was sharing a house with two of his unmarried older siblings by the Chapel farm. And yes, at age 17, he was a bricklayer's labourer, maybe for brother George who was an actual bricklayer!

I am afraid this George Dalliston slightly blotted his copybook the same year William joined up when, along with Ernest, the older brother of Charles Cook, (also commemorated on the Harleston Monument) and two other builders, he raided the cellar of the uninhabited building he was working on. Stealing 54 bottles of fine vintage wines over a period of weeks they had a fine old time. Ernest Cook 'got off' due to testifying, George Dalliston and the other two inebriates got a month's hard labour each, a lenient sentence in light of their previous good characters.

Their employer, Arthur Rayner, was the father of another of our Harleston Heros, Leonard Rayner.

William Dalliston signed up for 6 years and, ironically bearing in mind the escapades above, fresh out of the Army in 1911, was at aged 27 an unmarried Police Constable living, along with 162 other policemen at the Ambrosden Section House in Westminster –next to the Salvation Army Hostel! This impressive building, planned in 1887, has, much the same as the Cambridge Military Hospital now been converted to flats. William married Rosa Frost in Kensington in 1914, presumably shortly before he got hauled back into the Army. Rosa was the daughter of Giles Frost, for many years an employee of the Gawdy Hall estate and a relative of the Frosts who also produced a Harleston Hero.

Rosa and William's first child, also named Rosa, was born in London, the second, Dorothy L E, in Wortwell, their third Gordon TM back in London. William Dalliston continued as a member of the London Police Force until his retirement in 1932. At this point William returned home and took over the Yew Tree in Redenhall, but it appears he gave up the pub in 1937, following the death of his wife. Rosa and William's second child, Dorothy Lily went on to marry, Sgt John Joseph Duffy; he, the husband of Edward Bly Dalliston's niece, is commemorated in his own right on the Harleston Memorial.
